[The major revision to my 1991 thesis on “African technological transfer of ironmaking in western Maryland, 1750 – 1860” is the firm identification of quartz pieces in the coffins of the Catocin Furnace burials as African symbols of power. In 1997, I brought a community college African History class to hear Robert Farris Thompson, the Yale University art historian of Africa, speak at UC Berkeley. He stated, in his powerful and inimitable style, that quartz had been found in coffins in Maryland, and that these were important symbols of honoring a powerful person in Kongo culture.]
